The May Manton Fashions

EVERY woman likes a becoming house gown. Here is one with a smart collar and shaped back that gives graceful lines and which at the same time is perfectly simple and easy to adjust. As shown here, it is made of one of the new batistes with the collar and cuffs of white lace trimmed. It is just as appropriate for chills and for cashmere and for albatross as it is for the cotton fabrics however, indeed it can be utilized for anything that is simple and adapted to house gowns. The chills are very charming just now and would be pretty made in this way, and albatross makes a perfect house gown. For the collar and cuffs would be of the same trimmed, or they could be of a simple taffeta or silk. Among the washable materials, the crepes are conspicuous, but the town and batistes and ginghams always hold their place. The ginghams are very beautiful and gingham is well adapted to this model. Cashmere always is a handsome material for the house gown. It is very good for this design and it would be pretty to make the collar and cuffs of the same with scalloped edges and perhaps a little embroidery worked within them. The collar may be cut with square fronts as it is here or round, tapering to points. Here, there is a belt of the material attached to the under-arm seams and arranged over the front, but ribbon always makes a pretty finish and can be used instead. There are certain simple silks that could be utilized and some of the new foulards show quaint designs not unlike the one illustrated and they are pretty made in just this way. What is known as kimono crepes are good materials and the designs and colorings are extremely interesting. Altogether while the gown is a very simple one it can be treated in many different ways. For the medium size will be needed 24 yards of material 27 inches wide, 7 1/2 yards 36 or 34 yards 44 with 1/4 yard 38 for the collar and cuffs, and 3 yards of banding and 1 1/2 yards of edging. The pattern 332 is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 inches bust measure. 332 (with banding line and added seam allowance). House Gown, 34 to 44 bust measure.

THE NEW PLAYS

"Bunny" an Example of Forced Sentiment.

BY CHARLES DARNTON

EVEN the bookworm will turn. This is the idea, perhaps, that Austin Strong had in mind when he wrote "Bunny." At any rate, no other idea worthy of mention could be discovered in the play produced last night at the Hudson Theatre.

For some reason, unknown to me, the man devoted to books is supposed to be as dry as the leaves he turns over in his quest for romance. As a matter of fact, most of us find our romance in books that express for us the thoughts and sensations we hesitate to confess. Put the whole thing into a nutshell and call it love, if you like—any word will answer! But a play that deals quaintly with love must have the charm found in the mist which never quite reveals the one and only secret of life. Imagination is all very well in its way, but a play must be either poetic or vital. "Bunny" is neither.

Frankly, Mr. Strong's latest contribution to the stage bored me. For one thing, it seemed as though the first act would never end. But it did end—in talk. Then the strange, uneventful story went on in more talk. When a man makes love to a girl through a door to which he has the key he can scarcely be accused of making the most of his opportunity, can he? I leave it to you. And yet here was the situation upon which "Bunny" turned.

The so-called "Bunny" kept to his books until a soldier, whose reputation was less glorious than his uniform started a march to the altar with a rather knowing young creature named Sylvia. If the somewhat impromptu preliminaries seemed more like a street riot than a wedding procession, the blame must rest with the stage manager. It remained for the gentle "Bunny" to put the bride-elect behind lock and key and then to blaze away with a pistol at the naturally incensed gentleman who had been left waiting at the church.

If "Bunny" had been as temperamental as his pistol we might have understood the order's sudden change of front. More remarkable than anything else in the play was the explosion of the pistol when it had been placed in "Bunny's" desk. After hearing that report we were prepared for anything. It was only a matter of a third act to have "Bunny" carry off the uncertain Sylvia. Sentimental nonsense? Just that and nothing more!

To make the whole affair still more impossible, Lewis S. Stone was not happily cast as the hero of this wild and rather weird adventure. An actor with a whimsical sense of humor—Ernest Lawford, let us say—might have given this character a touch that would have brought out smiles and sympathy. Mr. Stone, in spite of the efforts of a well-trained actor, failed to "make" himself into the part. Gypsy O'Brien was a pretty Sylvia, if nothing more, and Hilda Spang acted very well as an Irish lady with an appreciation of love's young dream. In paying court to her, Henry Stephenson carried off a titled Englishman with honors. In spite of the handicap he was compelled to overcome when he said to "Bunny": "I'm not ashamed of these tears. When my girl hit it gets me where my vitals grow. An actor that can say that sort of thing and 'get away with it' deserves a cross of some sort or other. Eva Le Gallienne played a 'slavey' with great industry and a Cockney accent obviously manufactured on this side of the water. But—setting aside—why should an American try to write an English play? Artificiality can be the only result.
